Jewish Community Foundation celebrates 40 years of giving

San Diego's Jewish Community Foundation celebrated its 40th year of giving by inviting givers and guests to a preview of "Journey to the Copper Age" at the Museum of Man.

Almost 500 turned out for the celebration.

Sheila Potiker chairs the foundation, and Elaine and Murray Galinson were honorary co-chairs of the preview. Mary Lyn Salvador, director of the museum, was there to help welcome the guests. Mayor Jerry Sanders was there, too, to speak.

More in the crowd were Pauline Foster, Marcia Hazan, Julie and Edgar Berner, Elaine and Peter Chortek, Jeffrey Silberman, Joann and Eric Weitzen, Paul Palmer, Ellen and Bill Whelan, Emily and Dan Einhorn, Claire and David Ellman, Phyllis Epstein, Derrick Cartwright, Lucy Goldman, Henry Haimsohn, Merle Fischlowitz, David Gillig, and Jerri-Ann and Gary Jacobs.

Susan and David Kabakoff were there, and so were Marjory Kaplan and J.H. Surbeck (she is the foundation's CEO), Miriam and Jerome Katzin, Karen Kessler, Marty Klitzner, Annika and Gordon Kovtun, Lael and Jay Kovtun, Robert Lazarus, Felicia and David Mandelbaum, Mary Ann and Hilliard Harper, Jim Nierman, Deborah Horwitz and Paul Nierman, and Emily and Chris Jennewein.

Still more were Linda and Shearn Platt, Lori and Kenneth Polin, Marcie Sinclair and Andrew Ratner, Jane and Colin Scher, Alan Ziter, Sherron and Jack Schuster, Barbara and Lawrence Sherman, Elene and

In the fiscal year 2005-06, the Jewish Community Foundation gave more than $53 million in grants to 800 charitable organizations. It was founded in 1967 — making it San Diego's oldest community foundation — and has granted more than $400 million to nonprofits since that time.

"Journey to the Copper Age" is based on a research expedition led by Thomas Levy of UCSD. He attended the foundation's anniversary party, and he and Osnat Misch-Brandl, a curator from the Israel Museum, guided tours of the exhibit.
